NATURAL INTEGRATION

The house was designed giving importance to the integration of interior and exterior spaces, creating floor-to-ceiling windows and doors that also allow a lot of natural light to enter.

Enjoying the advantages (and beauty) of modern architecture, without giving up the integration of the building in nature and the surrounding landscape is possible, and this house proves it. Built by the architects of Taylor Smyth's studio, this house located in the Forest Hill neighborhood of Toronto, has managed to fit in with its neighbors, more classic and traditional. The key? Choose materials present in the area, such as large slabs of Indiana limestone, or locally sourced stone, both used to clad the exterior walls and base of the house. In addition, the relief and texture of the stones help to break with an aesthetic that would otherwise be flat and boring.
